Scientists said the findings suggest the Antarctic ice sheet is even more stable than previously thought. It showed that motion in the deep rock structure beneath the ice sheet is very slow, but that the top layer of ice is more like a "floating ice sheet", jiggling up and down slowly and continuously. The team fitted seismometers into holes drilled into the subglacial structure – where the ice meets the bedrock – to record vibrations caused by earthquakes and by waves of ice movement. The researchers also used GPS tracking devices to map the movement of the ice sheet over multiple years. The findings, published in Nature Communications, showed that the bedrock layer beneath the ice sheet is very slow to vibrate and only moves around 20m a year. This is 82138339de
